Reengineering The Fight Against Money Laundering

Money laundering involves converting the proceeds of crime into legitimate forms (laundering) in order to conceal their illicit origins. Criminal proceeds are often laundered via the financial system through different types of instruments, vehicles, and sectors such as trusts, "prete-noms", casinos and gambling, the legal profession, virtual currencies including "bitcoin", amongst many other forms. These operations often involve transactions – both national and international – that can fit in one of three stages, that is, "placement", "layering" and "integration" in order to disguise the illegal sources of the funds. Let's not forget that corruption often fuels money laundering. This is why the ICAC has adopted a holistic approach and strategy to wage war against corruption and money laundering by engaging with the different sectors of life. It is for this reason that the ICAC continuously seeks the collaboration and engagement of other stakeholders, including the Police Force, the Financial Intelligence Unit, the financial regulators, the Customs Department, the Prison Service, the Legal Profession, Civil Society and the Media...
